Above all, it's about people

Your Role as a Production Trainee

Construction is a very dynamic industry - no two days on site are the same. Project and site managers need the skills to drive a project forward, even when unforeseen events occur. By managing key relationships they ensure that the customer receives a first class service, delivering the project safely, on time, within budget and to a very high standard.

The Production Training Programme, accredited by the Chartered Institute of Building, is a key step towards becoming a site or project manager.

The programme combines in-house technical training with responsibility on one of our many jobs from day one. This ensures that you have the opportunity to continuously put theory into practise. You will receive on-the-job training in all elements of construction plus support in pursuing professional qualifications or further education.

As a member of the construction team you will be responsible for various functions including:

- Promoting and developing our reputation for providing the highest standards of site safety, health and welfare and protection of the environment
- Carrying out the project economically, on time and to the required quality with projects completed 'Right First Time'
- Working with the subcontractors and surveyors to protect our contractual position and the potential for profit
- Developing and maintaining good working relationships with the client, design team, subcontractors and suppliers by promoting best practice throughout the construction process

You will be an important member of the team responsible for achieving our objectives of a safe, high quality and profitable contract with a satisfied client.

Imagine in years to come walking past an impressive building and being able to say; "I was part of a team that built this safely and profitably.
